Critical thinking:

Being able to think quickly and adapt to the situation, it's being faced with problems that either seem impossible or sudden and being able to overcome it. It can be used for success because it is being able to cope with difficult situations and finding a way to finish. Also with huge projects and managing a team it helps you understand what is needed and how to obtain it. I feel that my level with critical thinking is good because I can find answers to problems I'm faced with easily and be able to make changes accordingly to match the situation.

Case Study:

A great deal of research from all prospective with as much detail and in-depth knowledge you can find. To start a case study all you need is a topic, from there just simply research the subject and find both positive and negative opinions and ideas that show some aspect of your topic. Case studies are beneficial to business because in order to truly understand your competition, product or sponsors you need to know everything about it from. All the pros and cons to what their real meaning is and how they plan to achieve. Just having that background knowledge not only makes you prepared, but also gives a sense of knowledge. However, if I were to do a case study I know that I can find the information easily, but I also know that I don't go deep enough in my research to truly understand the pros and cons of my topic.
